Cuts to public health are "unnecessary, undesirable and unacceptable"

The ADPH has today expressed "deep disappointment" as the Government announces a further £85 million of cuts to frontline public health services. The ADPH is warning that the current funding situation is "unnecessary, undesirable and unacceptable".

According to analysis by the Health Foundation, there will have been a £0.7bn real terms cut to the public health grant between 2014/15 and 2019/20. A reduction of almost a quarter in spending per person. This impacts upon frontline public health services such as obesity programmes, drug and alcohol treatment, sexual health, health visitors and school nurses.

The ADPH will be making an ambitious case for investing in public health ahead of the planned Spending Review. We will be calling for £3.2 billion a year extra into public health grants, and additional resources to tackle the social determinants of health, from poverty to housing to transport to crime.

ADPH Chief Executive, Nicola Close, said:

"The decision to make further cuts to frontline public health by £85 million is unnecessary, undesirable and unacceptable.

"Directors of Public Health have been relentlessly focussed on effectively managing funding reductions, in the context of increasing demand, whilst also modernising services. However, this is not sustainable, especially when combined with wider cuts to local government which have hit a range of community facilities that are key to improving public health, such as libraries and leisure centres.

"The Spending Review provides a unique opportunity to put aside the deep disappointment at years of cuts and invest in every possible opportunity to tackle the social determinants of health across national and local government."
